Checking In

Staff can request that service users 'check in' periodically, sending their location from their smart device to show that they have arrived at work or a job interview, for example. As well as saving staff time and providing a more effective, cost-efficient service, this voluntary supervision offers greater autonomy for service users than current methods and is less intrusive than visits or calls from staff. For additional security, biometric verification can be requested during check-in.

Support

Service users can access a wide range of mobile learning courses to help them continue any learning or training they may have started in custody. These courses function fully offline, so are available any time. Socrates 360 also offers an extensive library of careers videos and information to support service users into employment. Staff can make sure service users stay on track by setting appointments, as well as using voluntary monitoring to ask users to 'check in'.

Wellbeing

As well as more frequent contact with staff, service users are provided with tools to more effectively manage their own wellbeing. The local services search and contacts directory mean that service users are never short of someone to turn to, and Socrates 360 includes advice and guidance on conditions, healthy living, relationships and more. Medical documents can also be stored on the app for easy access.

Communication

The Socrates 360 app complements existing face-to-face probation and parole services by facilitating remote communication. The in-built video calling system is secure and easy to use, and staff can also send messages, notifications and forms to service users to keep in touch.
